

Supplement to the Hawaiian Gazette, July 13th, 1881.

Proceedings of the Bench and Bar.

Addreses Upon the Death of the Late Chief Justice.

Last Wednesday, July 8th, the Court met at 10 o'clock a.m. Mr. S. H. Hartwell opened the proceedings by saying: "A meeting of the Bar was held Saturday, the 20 inst., at which a Committee was chosen to draft resolutions concerning Chief Justice Harris. The resolutions which I now present have been adopted, and I respectfully ask that they be entered upon the records."

The Bar of the Supreme Court or the Hawaiian Bar, as it is called, at their meeting, the Attorney-General of the Kingdom this sixth day of July A.D. 1881, in respect for the memory of His Excellency the late Chief Justice Charles C. Harris, to the members of the Bar of the Colony of Hawaii, and to the members of the Hawaiian Kingdom have submitted a great loss:

That the members of this Bar do remember their late Chief Justice Harris, and to the members of the late Chief Justice their sincere condolence.

That the members of this Bar do express a moving regret upon the loss of their beloved friend, for understandingly deplored his death, and to the memory of the dead or for the intelligence of his passing.

That these resolutions be presented in open Court with the request that they be entered upon the records of the Supreme Court.

ASSTON S. HARTWELL,
EDWARD FRENTON,
S. D. DAVIS.

Mr. Hartwell then made the following address: "Mr. Hartwell's address. In any respects I make concerning the late Chief Justice Harris, I propose to say nothing of his worth, his services, for understandingly deplored his death, and to the memory of the dead or for the intelligence of his passing.

He was a man of great worth, having had a

In private life he was a noble, ingenuous gentleman, with a quaint and genial humor and a kind and friendly manner, which won the hearts of social intercourse with him.

In his death I feel that I have lost a personal friend whose society and advice were very valuable to me.

In common with the whole community, I mourn his untimely end.

As we stand by his recently-made grave, and look into its depths, it is difficult not to be reminded of the thought that we shall see his mortal face and form no more. With unsworned feelings of the痛 of the poet come to us:

"O let the sad shellshells break,

Let thought be quickened and awake;

How soon this life is past and gone,

And death comes mirthless standing on."

Mr. Dole followed Mr. Austin:

S. B. Dole, Esq., then rose and said—May it please the Court, there is one thing I wish to say in regard to the late Chief Justice. I wish to bear witness to his great wisdom, his frankness, and his integrity. Even when he was in good health this was rather matched. He seemed to shrink from absenting himself from his work, taking but very few vacations. His physical condition was that of a man who was in good health which even then had become serious. Since then, with but little interruption, he has attended to his work with great energy, in spite of his infirmities. He has a number of friends of whom few realized besides his intimate friends and those of us who have practiced before him. He has died his manly and with a firmness which I have never seen equalled. Even when he had laid his strong manhood low. Those who have known him have long thought that he would not at any time give up the struggle. But now we see that he has done so. In seems to me that the cause which it has come to him, it seems to me, has been a noble cause, and worthy to be a cheerful example to us all.

Mr. Austin: "A. F. Judd, First Associate Justice, spoke in the following words:

Hon. A. F. Judd, First Associate Justice, said: "Friends and Fellowmen.—I have been told that the Court prostate in death the lament of the poor King over Saul came to mind:—How are the mighty fallen in the midst of battle." When the president of the United States gave his last respects to the dead chief justice, he said to his old retainers, "I doubt the character was not in the minds of us all, that with the loss of the Chief Justice, the nation has lost its chief adviser, and the nation in the main its soul."

The liberal education received at Harvard College, with some experience at the Bar, gave Judge Harris a good preparation for the battle of life. He arrived at the Islands with a family man, during his early years, and was a model husband and father. In his later years he was an attorney at law, a writer, a lawyer, was actually afraid of his old enemies. His self-sacrifice was another distinct characteristic. As well as his excellent common sense will cause him long to be missed in the public service.

He offered his services by other means than by tact. He was a man of high courage, moral as well as physical. I think he never feared man and was unfeared in physical strength. He was a man of great energy, and was constantly working, even up to the day of his death. He died in harness as few have the good fortune to die. I speak of this because it seems natural to me, and makes me feel that we will be able to cherish this memory, and to set up a cheerful example to us all.

Mr. Austin: "S. D. Davis, Esq., then rose and said:

Mr. Hartwell then made the following address: "Mr. Hartwell's address. In any respects I make concerning the late Chief Justice Harris, I propose to say nothing of his worth, his services, for understandingly deplored his death, and to the memory of the dead or for the intelligence of his passing.

He was a man of great worth, having had a large and varied practice, which never lost sight of his object, which was inuring to his accomplishment; strong in a mind stored with the facts and details in this country for over thirty years, with a desire to do his duty to his country and his people, with power to discern the weaknesses or tricks of others. No one ever deceived him. Death had laid this strong man low. Those who have known him have long thought that he would not at any time give up the struggle. But now we see that he has done so. In seems to me that the cause which it has come to him, it seems to me, has been a noble cause, and worthy to be a cheerful example to us all.

Mr. Austin: "A. F. Judd, First Associate Justice, spoke in the following words:

Hon. A. F. Judd, First Associate Justice, said: "Friends and Fellowmen.—I have been told that the Court prostate in death the lament of the poor King over Saul came to mind:—How are the mighty fallen in the midst of battle." When the president of the United States gave his last respects to the dead chief justice, he said to his old retainers, "I doubt the character was not in the minds of us all, that with the loss of the Chief Justice, the nation has lost its chief adviser, and the nation in the main its soul."

The liberal education received at Harvard College, with some experience at the Bar, gave Judge Harris a good preparation for the battle of life. He arrived at the Islands with a family man, during his early years, and was a model husband and father. In his later years he was an attorney at law, a writer, a lawyer, was actually afraid of his old enemies. His self-sacrifice was another distinct characteristic. As well as his excellent common sense will cause him long to be missed in the public service.

He offered his services by other means than by tact. He was a man of high courage, moral as well as physical. I think he never feared man and was unfeared in physical strength. He was a man of great energy, and was constantly working, even up to the day of his death. He died in harness as few have the good fortune to die. I speak of this because it seems natural to me, and makes me feel that we will be able to cherish this memory, and to set up a cheerful example to us all.

Mr. Austin: "S. D. Davis, Esq., then rose and said:

Mr. Hartwell then made the following address: "Mr. Hartwell's address. In any respects I make concerning the late Chief Justice Harris, I propose to say nothing of his worth, his services, for understandingly deplored his death, and to the memory of the dead or for the intelligence of his passing.

He was a man of great worth, having had a large and varied practice, which never lost sight of his object, which was inuring to his accomplishment; strong in a mind stored with the facts and details in this country for over thirty years, with a desire to do his duty to his country and his people, with power to discern the weaknesses or tricks of others. No one ever deceived him. Death had laid this strong man low. Those who have known him have long thought that he would not at any time give up the struggle. But now we see that he has done so. In seems to me that the cause which it has come to him, it seems to me, has been a noble cause, and worthy to be a cheerful example to us all.

Mr. Austin: "A. F. Judd, First Associate Justice, spoke in the following words:

Hon. A. F. Judd, First Associate Justice, said: "Friends and Fellowmen.—I have been told that the Court prostate in death the lament of the poor King over Saul came to mind:—How are the mighty fallen in the midst of battle." When the president of the United States gave his last respects to the dead chief justice, he said to his old retainers, "I doubt the character was not in the minds of us all, that with the loss of the Chief Justice, the nation has lost its chief adviser, and the nation in the main its soul."

The liberal education received at Harvard College, with some experience at the Bar, gave Judge Harris a good preparation for the battle of life. He arrived at the Islands with a family man, during his early years, and was a model husband and father. In his later years he was an attorney at law, a writer, a lawyer, was actually afraid of his old enemies. His self-sacrifice was another distinct characteristic. As well as his excellent common sense will cause him long to be missed in the public service.

He offered his services by other means than by tact. He was a man of high courage, moral as well as physical. I think he never feared man and was unfeared in physical strength. He was a man of great energy, and was constantly working, even up to the day of his death. He died in harness as few have the good fortune to die. I speak of this because it seems natural to me, and makes me feel that we will be able to cherish this memory, and to set up a cheerful example to us all.

Mr. Austin: "S. D. Davis, Esq., then rose and said:

Mr. Hartwell then made the following address: "Mr. Hartwell's address. In any respects I make concerning the late Chief Justice Harris, I propose to say nothing of his worth, his services, for understandingly deplored his death, and to the memory of the dead or for the intelligence of his passing.

He was a man of great worth, having had a large and varied practice, which never lost sight of his object, which was inuring to his accomplishment; strong in a mind stored with the facts and details in this country for over thirty years, with a desire to do his duty to his country and his people, with power to discern the weaknesses or tricks of others. No one ever deceived him. Death had laid this strong man low. Those who have known him have long thought that he would not at any time give up the struggle. But now we see that he has done so. In seems to me that the cause which it has come to him, it seems to me, has been a noble cause, and worthy to be a cheerful example to us all.

Mr. Austin: "A. F. Judd, First Associate Justice, spoke in the following words:

Hon. A. F. Judd, First Associate Justice, said: "Friends and Fellowmen.—I have been told that the Court prostate in death the lament of the poor King over Saul came to mind:—How are the mighty fallen in the midst of battle." When the president of the United States gave his last respects to the dead chief justice, he said to his old retainers, "I doubt the character was not in the minds of us all, that with the loss of the Chief Justice, the nation has lost its chief adviser, and the nation in the main its soul."

The liberal education received at Harvard College, with some experience at the Bar, gave Judge Harris a good preparation for the battle of life. He arrived at the Islands with a family man, during his early years, and was a model husband and father. In his later years he was an attorney at law, a writer, a lawyer, was actually afraid of his old enemies. His self-sacrifice was another distinct characteristic. As well as his excellent common sense will cause him long to be missed in the public service.

He offered his services by other means than by tact. He was a man of high courage, moral as well as physical. I think he never feared man and was unfeared in physical strength. He was a man of great energy, and was constantly working, even up to the day of his death. He died in harness as few have the good fortune to die. I speak of this because it seems natural to me, and makes me feel that we will be able to cherish this memory, and to set up a cheerful example to us all.

Mr. Austin: "S. D. Davis, Esq., then rose and said:

Mr. Hartwell then made the following address: "Mr. Hartwell's address. In any respects I make concerning the late Chief Justice Harris, I propose to say nothing of his worth, his services, for understandingly deplored his death, and to the memory of the dead or for the intelligence of his passing.

He was a man of great worth, having had a large and varied practice, which never lost sight of his object, which was inuring to his accomplishment; strong in a mind stored with the facts and details in this country for over thirty years, with a desire to do his duty to his country and his people, with power to discern the weaknesses or tricks of others. No one ever deceived him. Death had laid this strong man low. Those who have known him have long thought that he would not at any time give up the struggle. But now we see that he has done so. In seems to me that the cause which it has come to him, it seems to me, has been a noble cause, and worthy to be a cheerful example to us all.

Mr. Austin: "A. F. Judd, First Associate Justice, spoke in the following words:

Hon. A. F. Judd, First Associate Justice, said: "Friends and Fellowmen.—I have been told that the Court prostate in death the lament of the poor King over Saul came to mind:—How are the mighty fallen in the midst of battle." When the president of the United States gave his last respects to the dead chief justice, he said to his old retainers, "I doubt the character was not in the minds of us all, that with the loss of the Chief Justice, the nation has lost its chief adviser, and the nation in the main its soul."

The liberal education received at Harvard College, with some experience at the Bar, gave Judge Harris a good preparation for the battle of life. He arrived at the Islands with a family man, during his early years, and was a model husband and father. In his later years he was an attorney at law, a writer, a lawyer, was actually afraid of his old enemies. His self-sacrifice was another distinct characteristic. As well as his excellent common sense will cause him long to be missed in the public service.

He offered his services by other means than by tact. He was a man of high courage, moral as well as physical. I think he never feared man and was unfeared in physical strength. He was a man of great energy, and was constantly working, even up to the day of his death. He died in harness as few have the good fortune to die. I speak of this because it seems natural to me, and makes me feel that we will be able to cherish this memory, and to set up a cheerful example to us all.

Mr. Austin: "S. D. Davis, Esq., then rose and said:

Mr. Hartwell then made the following address: "Mr. Hartwell's address. In any respects I make concerning the late Chief Justice Harris, I propose to say nothing of his worth, his services, for understandingly deplored his death, and to the memory of the dead or for the intelligence of his passing.

He was a man of great worth, having had a large and varied practice, which never lost sight of his object, which was inuring to his accomplishment; strong in a mind stored with the facts and details in this country for over thirty years, with a desire to do his duty to his country and his people, with power to discern the weaknesses or tricks of others. No one ever deceived him. Death had laid this strong man low. Those who have known him have long thought that he would not at any time give up the struggle. But now we see that he has done so. In seems to me that the cause which it has come to him, it seems to me, has been a noble cause, and worthy to be a cheerful example to us all.

Mr. Austin: "A. F. Judd, First Associate Justice, spoke in the following words:

Hon. A. F. Judd, First Associate Justice, said: "Friends and Fellowmen.—I have been told that the Court prostate in death the lament of the poor King over Saul came to mind:—How are the mighty fallen in the midst of battle." When the president of the United States gave his last respects to the dead chief justice, he said to his old retainers, "I doubt the character was not in the minds of us all, that with the loss of the Chief Justice, the nation has lost its chief adviser, and the nation in the main its soul."

The liberal education received at Harvard College, with some experience at the Bar, gave Judge Harris a good preparation for the battle of life. He arrived at the Islands with a family man, during his early years, and was a model husband and father. In his later years he was an attorney at law, a writer, a lawyer, was actually afraid of his old enemies. His self-sacrifice was another distinct characteristic. As well as his excellent common sense will cause him long to be missed in the public service.

He offered his services by other means than by tact. He was a man of high courage, moral as well as physical. I think he never feared man and was unfeared in physical strength. He was a man of great energy, and was constantly working, even up to the day of his death. He died in harness as few have the good fortune to die. I speak of this because it seems natural to me, and makes me feel that we will be able to cherish this memory, and to set up a cheerful example to us all.

Mr. Austin: "S. D. Davis, Esq., then rose and said:

Mr. Hartwell then made the following address: "Mr. Hartwell's address. In any respects I make concerning the late Chief Justice Harris, I propose to say nothing of his worth, his services, for understandingly deplored his death, and to the memory of the dead or for the intelligence of his passing.

He was a man of great worth, having had a large and varied practice, which never lost sight of his object, which was inuring to his accomplishment; strong in a mind stored with the facts and details in this country for over thirty years, with a desire to do his duty to his country and his people, with power to discern the weaknesses or tricks of others. No one ever deceived him. Death had laid this strong man low. Those who have known him have long thought that he would not at any time give up the struggle. But now we see that he has done so. In seems to me that the cause which it has come to him, it seems to me, has been a noble cause, and worthy to be a cheerful example to us all.

Mr. Austin: "A. F. Judd, First Associate Justice, spoke in the following words:

Hon. A. F. Judd, First Associate Justice, said: "Friends and Fellowmen.—I have been told that the Court prostate in death the lament of the poor King over Saul came to mind:—How are the mighty fallen in the midst of battle." When the president of the United States gave his last respects to the dead chief justice, he said to his old retainers, "I doubt the character was not in the minds of us all, that with the loss of the Chief Justice, the nation has lost its chief adviser, and the nation in the main its soul."

The liberal education received at Harvard College, with some experience at the Bar, gave Judge Harris a good preparation for the battle of life. He arrived at the Islands with a family man, during his early years, and was a model husband and father. In his later years he was an attorney at law, a writer, a lawyer, was actually afraid of his old enemies. His self-sacrifice was another distinct characteristic. As well as his excellent common sense will cause him long to be missed in the public service.

He offered his services by other means than by tact. He was a man of high courage, moral as well as physical. I think he never feared man and was unfeared in physical strength. He was a man of great energy, and was constantly working, even up to the day of his death. He died in harness as few have the good fortune to die. I speak of this because it seems natural to me, and makes me feel that we will be able to cherish this memory, and to set up a cheerful example to us all.

Mr. Austin: "S. D. Davis, Esq., then rose and said:

Mr. Hartwell then made the following address: "Mr. Hartwell's address. In any respects I make concerning the late Chief Justice Harris, I propose to say nothing of his worth, his services, for understandingly deplored his death, and to the memory of the dead or for the intelligence of his passing.

He was a man of great worth, having had a large and varied practice, which never lost sight of his object, which was inuring to his accomplishment; strong in a mind stored with the facts and details in this country for over thirty years, with a desire to do his duty to his country and his people, with power to discern the weaknesses or tricks of others. No one ever deceived him. Death had laid this strong man low. Those who have known him have long thought that he would not at any time give up the struggle. But now we see that he has done so. In seems to me that the cause which it has come to him, it seems to me, has been a noble cause, and worthy to be a cheerful example to us all.

Mr. Austin: "A. F. Judd, First Associate Justice, spoke in the following words:

Hon. A. F. Judd, First Associate Justice, said: "Friends and Fellowmen.—I have been told that the Court prostate in death the lament of the poor King over Saul came to mind:—How are the mighty fallen in the midst of battle." When the president of the United States gave his last respects to the dead chief justice, he said to his old retainers, "I doubt the character was not in the minds of us all, that with the loss of the Chief Justice, the nation has lost its chief